Probable Suicide.

From Mr. John McDerwin, of Tiptop, who is now in Phenix, we learn some additional particulars concerning the death of A. J. Moore. The deceased had been to Tiptop camp, and had been drinking freely. On his return to the Springs he remarked that he would go and take a bath. Accompanied by another man he entered the bathing pool. After remaining in the water a considerable time his companion got out and called to Moore to do the same, remarking that he had already been in longer than was good for him. "No," answered Moore, "I am not coming out; when I came in here I made up my mind never to go out." His friend told him not to talk foolishly, and again urged him to come out, but he refused. The man then hurried to camp and reported that Moore was acting strangely, and he believed he was crazy. The entire party hastened to the spring, and when they arrived they found the body lying on the bottom face down, and the hands clutching the sandy bottom. From the position of the body and the actions of the deceased before death, they are of the opinion that he committed suicide—Phenix Herald.
